Reproducibility is a supposed hallmark of science but is elusive in practice. What should we make of failures to replicate? Should the scientific community be doing more to try systematically to replicate results? In this talk, I will provide a framework for thinking about ethics in science in relation to various goals of science. I will discuss different explanations for replication failures and will explore responsibilities of the scientific community in light of some of those goals.

If you would like to visit with Dr. Scott Tanona, please contact Nick Wallace at nwallac@ksu.edu.