Each year the Department of History evaluates students majoring in history through a direct assessment employing a rubric that evaluates student performance in the completion of a 20- to 25-page research paper assigned in our capstone course, History 586 “The Advanced Seminar in History.” At the completion of the course students are also assessed indirectly by means of an anonymous exit survey in which they provide their own evaluation of their proficiency in basic and advanced skills. During the 2019-2020 academic year, history faculty assessed majors across all five of our learning objectives. These Student Learning Objectives may be viewed at: https://www.k-state.edu/history/assessment/uslo.html

The results provided in this report were obtained from the direct assessment of the 23 students enrolled in the three sections of History 586 offered in the Fall 2019 and Spring 2020 semesters. Our assessment efforts were hampered by the Covid-19 crisis. While we completed direct assessment of all 23 students, only 11 students completed surveys at the end of the semester. In the category assessing the ability to distinguish between primary and secondary sources and to demonstrate how they are used to make historical claims, 100% of our students were rated at the “very good” or “good” levels. In the category assessing the ability to recognize that historical questions can be viewed from different perspectives, 96% of the students were rated “very good” or “good”, and 87% of our students were evaluated as “very good” or “good” for their ability to conduct historical research and find primary and secondary resources. In their ability to communicate their understanding of history through clear and effective writing, 96% of our students were rated at the “very good” or “good” levels. Finally, 96% of our students were rated “very good” or “good” in their ability to provide documentation in written work. These results are a significant improvement (between 10-30%) compared to the results of the 2018-2019 academic year.
